It has first-class functions.

A type that depends on a value, i.e. the type can reference a program.

Any correctness property can be captured in a type, greatly simplifying proofs.

The correctness of the entire system depends only on the correctness of the kernel. The size of the kernel allows manual verification, and complex proofs can be expressed just in terms of the kernel.